Pilot program remains laser-focused in the face of an Air Force pilot shortage

by George Woodward, 2nd Lt. Brittany Curry, Debi Smith, 82nd Training Wing Public Affairs

SHEPPARD AIR FORCE BASE, Texas -- Officials with the Euro-NATO Joint Jet Pilot Training Program remain laser-focused on maximizing training production as the Air Force faces a growing pilot shortage.

"The Air Force is currently about 500 pilots short of requirements," Col. Paul Moga, 80th Flying Training Wing vice commander, said. "And that number is projected to reach 800 by 2022."

The challenge is heightened by changes in the commercial airline industry, Moga said, which by some estimates will be seeking to hire 3,500 new pilots annually over the next two decades.

Because of their experience, military pilots are often prime hiring targets for airlines.

Max Production

"The Air Force is taking steps to retain as many of its pilots as possible," Moga said. "Our role here is to continue producing new pilots at maximum capacity."

The 80th met all of its production targets on time in 2015, and is aiming to do the same this year.

"It was a true team effort to meet all of our training objectives last year, and it will take the same kind of determined effort to do it again," Moga said. "We can't afford to fail – it's not only the U.S. Air Force depending on us, but the air forces of our partner nations as well."

"ENJJPT, the world's only internationally manned and managed pilot training program, is considered the premier fighter pilot training program in the world and has produced more than 7,100 pilots for the NATO alliance since its establishment in 1981," Moga said.
